One of the accomplishments of the expedition was the ascent of the summit of Corupuna, the second highest mountain a South America. Only two men of the expedition, Prof. Bingham and H. L. Tucker, got to the top, which, indicated by their barometers, was 22,500 feet above Bronze Bust by Rodin Already Partly sea level. They took measurements by triangulation, the figures of which will be made known later, to prove the barometric records The ascent was completed to cover 2,000 feet a day, but the climbers found that they were not equal to the task. They did average 1,800 feet from the timline, where the real climbing practically began, and they completed the job
